Also called Assurance (and in 17th c. sometimes Enshurance).

Assurance is the earlier term, used alike of marine and life insurance before the end of 18th c. In general application is retained in the titles and policies of some long-established companies (e.g. the London Assurance Corporation) Insurance (in 17th c. also Ensurance) is the earlier form in reference to fire. (1635 in Insure 7 a), but soon became extensive with assurance, the two terms being synonymous in Magens 1755 (see Assurance 8). Assurance would probably have dropped out of use (as it has almost done in U.S.) but that Babbage in 1826 (see quot.) proposed to restrict insurance to risks to property, and assurance to life insurance This has been followed so far that assurance is now rarely used of marine, fire, or accident insurance, and is retained in Great Britain in the nomenclature and law of the majority of life insurance companies But in general popular use, insurance is the prevalent term Mr T. B. Sprague, followed by others, considers assurance, ensure, assurer, etc., the proper words for the action of the company or persons undertaking the risk, insurance, insure, insurer, etc., for that of the person paying the premium. This would be in some respects a useful distinction, if it could be carried out, but it would leave the members of mutual societies at once assurers and insurers

If this distinction be admitted assurance will signify a contract dependent on the duration of life, which must either happen or fail, and insurance will mean a contract relating to any other uncertain event which may partly happen or partly fail. 1848 Arnould *Mar. The extensive and complex development of senses in I and OF. is reflected also in English. But the chronological appearance of the senses here does not accord with their original development, those first taken over from French in 13–14th c. being figurative uses, far removed from the literal sense, which was only adopted directly from L. about or after 1600. As an attempt at chronological order would only end in chaos, a logical arrangement, according to the main with the development as gathered from ill dated language, is here followed. But the history of senses is obscure: see VI. The sense of early quotations is also often difficult to determine.]

Intent (intɛ·nt), a. [ad. L. intent-us bent on (something), strained, attentive, earnest, eager, pa. pple. of intendĕre to INTEND, cf. OF. entent intended, attentive, as adjunct.

Intent and intentive are etymologically doublets, intentus and intensus being two forms of the L. pple., but already in L. intensus was (like the simple tensus) more restricted to the physical sense 'stretched, strained', intentus to the tense violent, while intentus was extended to the notion of 'mentally or nervously on the stretch, intent, eager'. Hence in the modern language this differentiation has been made more complete. So with intention, intension.]

11 Logic The direction or application of the mind to an object, a conception formed by directing the mind to some object, a general concept First Intentions, Second Intentions, terms applied to the first or direct application of the mind to the things themselves, e g the concepts of a tree, an oak Second intentions, secondary conceptions formed by the application of thought to first intentions in their relations to each other, e g the concept of genus, species, variety, property, accident, differentia, identity

The introduction of these terms is due to the early Latin translation of Avicenna, in which the Arabic معقولات maʿqūlāt 'perceptions, notions' pl of معقول maʿqūl 'what is perceived by the intellect, intelligible, known', is rendered by intentiones Thus in Avicenna Metaph I, 2 (Venice 1508) 'subjectum vero logicæ, sunt secundæ intentiones intellectæ secundo [الثانية للمعقولات al maʿqūlat al thāniyah] quæ quemadmodum intentionibus primo intellectis [الاولى للمعقولات al maʿqūlāt al ulā], secundum quod per eas perventur de cognito ad incognitum Hence in Alberti Magnus (1193?-1280) Metaph I, I, 1 'Dicendum primo, quod (Metaph 1051, 11) 'ens' dupliciter potest considerari ens et partem entis aliquid, uno modo intentiones secundæ circa res per sermonem positas per quas via scientiæ ordinatur ad res' Thirdly, Duns Scotus (1265?-1308) Oxon 1584) identifies intentio with notio 'notion' 'prima notio seu prima intentio' [Metaph I, 3, 1]

Inter-, prefix. The Latin preposition and adv., inter 'between, among, amid, in between, in the midst', entered into combination with verbs, adjs., and sbs., as in inter-cēdere to go between, intercede, inter-spĕrse to scatter on the way, intercept, inter-dictio to interpose in speech, interdict, interserĕre to throw between, interject, interspīnŏsus to put between, interpose, intervenīre to come between, intervene, intercalāri intercalary, interdiū, dialis lying between the fingers, interfluus flowing between, intermedius intermediate, intermūrālis between walls, interanimum a place between rivers, intercisium the space between the eyebrows, intervallum unum the space between two columns, internum tus a messenger between, interregnum the time between two reigns, intervallum the space between two ramparts, interval. Some of these uses received great extension in late L. and the Romanic languages

Of all these classes representatives are found in English, the earlier derived through French, the later often immediately from Latin. The Fr. form of the prefix is entre, and it was with entre- or enter, as in entr'echange, entrecouse, entr'ire, that these words were taken into ME., and new compounds formed in Eng. itself. ENTER, between the 15th and 17th centuries, entre, enter, gradually yielded to the L. inter-, intr-, intra- and interprise, with their derivatives, being now the only relics of the earlier form. On the pattern of the words from L., many new derivatives have been formed from L. (or Gr.) elements, esp. the adjs. formed on the type (rare in L.) of inter-mūri-āl-is see 4 below

In some cases English received from Latin and French both the simple word and its inter- compound such are change, inter change, commune, inter commune, view, inter view, column, inter column. By extension from such compounds, inter became a living prefix, freely used to form new compounds upon verbs, nouns, and adjs., not merely of Latin and French, but of native English origin, as in inter twine, inter talk, inter brain, inter-tidal Finally, the same process which produced such adjs as anti slavery, anti vaccination, anti war (see ANTI 4), has produced the adjs inter-college, inter island, inter-town, inter university

The following are the uses of the prefix as an English formative element

I In adverbial or adjectival relation to the second element

1 Prefixed to verbs, participles, vbl sbs, and ppl adjs, to form verbs, etc

These are entered here in the uninflected form as verbs but some of them are exemplified only in the form of participles or vbl sbs As a rule, wherever there is a verb compounded with inter, the usual derivatives (vbl sb and ppl a in -ing, agent n in -er) are possible Some of the verbs may be regarded as formed from sbs, e g intercloud, -dash, layer, mesh, net, word The stress is on the radical element

a Denoting 'Between or among other things or persons, between the parts of, in the intervals of, or in the midst of, something; together with, between times or places, at intervals, here and there' as interbreathe (interbreathing vbl sb), chase -check, circle, -cloud, -come, -crust, curl, dash, -distinguish (interdistinguishable adj), fillet, -flash, -forge, gild (in pa pple -gilt), insert, involve, -layer, -lie (in pres pple -lying), lighten, mention, pave, peal, -receive, rule, -set, †-situate, -smile, sole, squeeze, tinge, -trace, -whistle, -word With an intr verb, inter sometimes stands in prepositional relation to a following noun, the verb thus becoming trans with the noun as obj, as interwend (to wend or pass between)

Such formations with ENTER are found in 15th c, and with inter from 16th c cf INTERPLACE Words of this form are much used by S Daniel c 1600

For the etymology of the second element, see the simple words Accessory, Acinous etc Ancient Latin had only a very few examples of this formation as inter-mundial, interanimus, interdigitalis, interlimis, intermittivus, but their number in modern times chiefly since 1600 and especially since 1800, is very great, and they are formed freely when needed Logically they are composed of inter + 1 sb. stem + adj suffix, but as the adj suffix is the same that is used in forming an adj from the simple word (e g nation, al inter national, college, al, inter college adj), they have the form of being composed of inter + adj, and in some later formations as inter-acinous, +-amygdalic, -interic, -ureteric, intra-motor, this is actually their structure The main stress is on the radical part

There is much that is obscure in the history of this word, first as to the adoption of I. interesse as sb., and secondly as to the laxity of the OF. sense, during the 13th c. No other sense is recorded in Fr. until the 16th c. As this was not the 13th c. sense of I. interesse, it is curious that the form of the Fr. word should have been affected by it. The relations between the sense-development in French and English in 16th c. are also fru itful

10 Money paid for the use of money lent (the principal), or for forbearance of a debt, according to a fixed ratio (rate per cent.)

Indirectly applied to limited interests, usually one or twice in the year. Simple interest is the interest paid on the principal as last. Compound (=compounded) interest (interest upon interest) is the interest eventually paid on a principal periodically increased by the addition of each fresh amount of interest so it becomes due and remains unpaid. Interest in this sense is formerly called usury, a use still applied when interest is charged at a rate beyond what is considered legitimate or just Interest (interesse, Interest) differed from usura (Usury) in that the latter was avowedly a charge for the use of money which was forbidden by the Canon Law, where as originally interesse referred to the compensation which under the Roman Law, was due by the debtor who had made default. In the course of time interesse came to mean the same as usura, the difference between the debtor's position and that of the debtor's riches and the position which might reasonably have been anticipated as the direct consequence of the debtor's default of his obligation. That some compensation was always permissible when it could be shown that such loss had really arisen (damnum emergens) At a later period interesse came to mean loss of profit (lucrum cessans), which was recognised as giving a claim to interest. both cases appear to be included in the formula damnum et interesse. The rate was usually a fixed sum specified in the contract, but a percentage reckoned periodically, so as to correspond to the creditor's loss was afterwards adopted in commercial transactions in England in the first half of the 14th cent) Interest in the modern sense which is first sanctioned by law (though apparently under cover of the old name) in 1545 by 37 Hen. VIII c. 9 (repealed quot 1545), this statute was repealed in 1552, but re-enacted in 1571 (see W. J. Ashley Engl. Econ. Hist. (1898) II. 397, 466, and T. S. Tucker in *Dict. Pol. ‡ Note The actual history of the words interlope, interloper, is somewhat obscure. Our earliest examples belong to the end of the 16th c. No form nor cognate of these words is found in any other language until after 1700, when the English sb. was adopted in Fr. as interlope (Savary Dict. de Comm. 1723), now interlope, applied to ship, and to a limited extent in Du. and LG. enterlopen in Halma, 1758-63, enterloper in Bremisches Wtrb. 1767) In Du. enterlooper is expressly stated in 1768 to be 'van de Engelse ontleend', borrowed from English, and is explained to mean the same thing as the proper Du. term Bezemer, used from the end of the 16th c. Interlope, interloper were thus of Engl. formation. About 1600, interlopers, intermeddlers, stragglers, straggling Englishmen, were synonymous appellations of the same class of persons (see Interloper 2 a, 1603; Intermeddler 1, 1601) Some of these synonyms suggest connexion with land loper, 'vagabond, vagrant, straggler', in common use before 1580 in place of the earlier land leaper (1560-1601), lope being the form of leap in eastern and some north midl. dialects (= north dial. lonp, loop). It seems probable therefore that the words of the type of interloper are identical with those of inter meddler and fund loper respectively, at least, this seems more likely than that the word should have been compounded of the L. and Engl. prefix inter- and the Du or LG. lōper, loopen to run, liper, looper runner, a combination which could not well have arisen in England, and of which we have no historical indication in any foreign parts where English and Dutch traders came in contact The earliest known references to the practices of interlopers are in connexion with the Russia Company, see Sir L. A. Jond's Introduction to Acosta at close of 16th c. (Hakl Soc. 1846) p. xxi seqq. But the word soon bec. one a well known term in connexion with the trade of the East India Company, referred to 1600 [].

Into (i·ntu), prep. Also 1 in to, 2-3 (Orm.) innto, 2-6 in to [Orig the two words, in adv., to prep., as in the similar collocations out to, up to, down to, away to, off to, on to, in from, out from away from, out of, etc., in which the adv. expresses the general direction of motion, and the prep. specifies or has reference to a particular point or place. In the case of in to, the two words may refer to the same space, as in 'he went in to the house', or to the to may refer to something which is in the space entered, as in 'he went in to the patient', it is from the former of these that the combined into has arisen, in the latter the words are still written separate But in early MSS and editions this is often neglected, not only are the words often written separate when the sense is combined, but they are sometimes written in one, when the sense is the unconnected in to (= person etc.). In in to, the n is long, in into the n is shortened by its rapid passage into the allied mute, t.]

General Sense. — The preposition expressing motion from without to a point within limits of space, time, condition, circumstance, etc., the motion which results in the position expressed by IN, or which is directed towards that position

In the Teutonic languages as in Latin this was originally expressed by the prep in followed by the accusative or case of direction, and so distinguished from the simple notion of position expressed by in with the locative or dative) but, when the case endings were becoming weak, end or lost in OE., so that the language was losing the power of making the dist nction expressed in Latin by in aquam : in aquam, the prep. in to unto was substituted for the latter The other Teutonic langs. having retained the inflexions, esp in the article and dem. pronouns, have not required a parallel formation of Ger. in den (ins) haus, in das (ins) wasser. In OE. inn was usually, like the simple in, construed with the dative, but also not infrequently, with the accusative like the simple in (on) which it superseded or the L. in which it rendered see sense 1.

As the prep. in, partly from it. Of blending with on (see In prep. 2) partly from its substitution with L. in, had various uses not readily expressed by modern prepositions, on was formerly used in certain cases properly expressed by into upon, towards, a mind, etc. (see On 1).

The earlier use of into in motion tended more gradually, so that there long remained (and still remains in uses and constructions in which it has the sense of in (see In prep. 2) coincidently in some districts, as in Central and North-eastern Scotch, into was extended to express position and thus took the sense of in (cf. In, down into sense III.
